Summary of Research Work

Knowledge management with an accent on knowledge hiding. One of the main research areas I started to contribute to already during my doctoral studies is knowledge hiding. As a co-author of one of the most impactful papers in this field, many empirical studies on antecedents and consequences of knowledge hiding, and after almost ten years of the existence of the 'knowledge hiding in organizations' construct also review studies, I can say that I meaningfully contributed to the development of this popular research area. And in turn, that the knowledge hiding concept and researchers studying it importantly contributed to my research development.

Creativity and innovation management. I started studying this area already during my doctoral studies, albeit mostly at the organizational level, where I focused on factors, content and outcomes of non-technological innovations, and most of all, management innovations. Nonetheless, I would state that the core content of my research represents the exploration of innovative work behavior; factors of creativity, translating creative ideas into implemented innovations, and the context of creative and innovative work process of employees. In this and other areas, human resource management represents an important content framework for my research.

Humanizing digital work. An area I've been developing in the last couple of years, albeit already before the pandemic, combines my research beginnings (leadership, organizational psychology) with a recently popular field of work digitalization and work in the digital economy. I first migrated into this field in 2015 with my colleagues from Norway with a project that focused on designing fair labor in the so called 'gig economy', mostly working through digital platforms. I later expanded this research endeavor into traditional work settings, by specifically focusing on working via digital means. Even before, but even more so after the coronavirus pandemic, I focus on exploring factors of a well-designed remote and hybrid work. The key principle guiding my research is how to make work with technology more humane through work and organizational design and leadership.
